EMERGING ARTISTS

EILEEN QUINLAN

In a somewhat large and low-ceilinged loft studio near the edge of downtown Los Angeles, Eileen Quinlan is at work on a series of huge paintings. Quinlan's square or rectangular panels, generally three by three feet, are filled with thick, organically arranged marks in a variety of colors. The artist's process involves applying mixed media directly to the canvas, cutting and stitching the paint to create layers and textures. This technique is inspired by Quinlan's experience as a trained textile artist, and it results in a unique visual language that is both painterly and sculptural. The paintings are often abstract, but they also reference the artist's interest in the human figure and the female body. Quinlan's work has been exhibited at various galleries and museums, and it is included in several private collections. In addition to her studio practice, Quinlan also teaches at a local university, where she shares her knowledge and experience with students. Her dedication to her craft and her commitment to her community are evident in her work, which is characterized by a sense of fluidity and emotional expression.
